

“Where are you? Give me back my wallet!”

The man in blue pinstripe stormed through the rooms of Birdie Kaminsky’s apartment like a long distance runner stoked on Red Bull. Flinching at the fury in his voice, she dangled from the window ledge and stared with wide-eyed fear at the pavement three stories below.

The man was seventy years old if he was a day. He probably worked out, which explained how he’d pursued her up three flights of stairs and made it into her apartment before she locked the door.

Old men and their treadmills. It was something she should’ve considered before picking his pocket on the way home from a light day of breaking and entering.

A sickening whoosh of fear zigzagged through her body. Her teeth were chattering, so she clamped her mouth shut. Three stories above terra firma made a straight drop a stupid idea. Like any good thief Birdie was agile. But the last time she’d checked she hadn’t sprouted wings. If she let go of the windowsill and took the plunge, she’d break her legs.

“Where are you hiding? You aren’t taking my money!”

Inside the apartment something crashed to the floor. Was the noise coming from the hallway that led from the closet-sized living room to the pea-sized bedroom? With any luck, Marathon Man would stop in the bathroom to check if she was hiding behind the shower curtain.

Her hold on the windowsill loosened and she gasped. “Oh, shit!”

Pressing her long legs forward, she flattened against the building’s brick façade. To her left, the drainpipe snaked down to the street. Reach for it and risk falling? Today was her thirty-first birthday and therefore a lucky day. On the other hand, her landlord had threatened to evict her this morning if she didn’t make good on her rent and a demonic old geezer was pounding on the bedroom door she’d had the sense to lock before she’d stupidly made her escape.

The window on the other side of the drainpipe slid open with a bang! Fear scuttled her heart. Mr. Chen stuck his head out and relief swamped her.

“Birdie! What happened?” More racket from pounding fists and Mr. Chen’s mouth formed an O. “Is it the police? Did they threaten you? You didn’t squeal on the Poker Kings, did you?”

Mr. Chen held Poker Kings, a Tuesday night game, in his apartment. He did a great job of seeding his hand with Aces and worried the cops would find out. Birdie figured he should worry about the other tenants learning he was fleecing them. The overworked Lexington Police Department had bigger fish to fry.

She smiled gamely. “Um, Mr. Chen, could you help me out? I’m gonna fall if you don’t.”

“Oh. Right.”

To her surprise, he jimmied a brick from the wall. When he’d finished, he steered her left foot into the handy inverse step he’d created. Stretching to the drainpipe, she grabbed hold then started toward his window. For all she knew, he stashed his ill-gotten poker winnings behind the brick.

No matter—his thieving heart was her salvation. He helped her through the window and into a kitchen infinitely more pristine than the condemned zone in her place. The fragrant scents of ginger and garlic mingled in the air. Mr. Chen had been preparing an early dinner while she was chased upstairs by the man whose pocket she’d picked.

Ignoring the rumbling in her stomach, she darted through the apartment. In the living room she found Mrs. Chen in the shiny new wheelchair Birdie had snagged from an assisted living facility last month. It hadn’t seemed fair for Mrs. Chen to spend hours on the phone, arguing with bureaucrats in her broken English. All she’d needed was a new set of wheels. Birdie was familiar with the pricey new facility—she’d eaten a free lunch in the cafeteria on more than one occasion. So she’d dolled up in a tight-fitting nurse’s uniform and set out to snatch a wheelchair for a deserving senior citizen.

She’d marched into the lobby, cornered a hunky security guard, and announced she needed to assist a woman who was having trouble getting out of her car. All too eager to help, the security guard was still checking out her ass when she rolled the wheelchair out to the parking lot.

Dismissing the memory, she paused before the wheelchair. “Good afternoon, Mrs. Chen.”

“Birdie, hello. You stay for dinner?”

“Naw. I have to leave the city.”

“For good?”

“My time in Lexington is up.”

“You a crazy white girl, but we miss you.” Mrs. Chen thrust out her lower lip.

“Wish you stay longer, steal a car for Yihung. His Buick is a beater.”

“I’ll grab him a Mercedes the next time I’m in Kentucky.” Regret sifted through her. Her fingers stung, too. Hell, her thumbs were bleeding—she nearly had lost her purchase on the windowsill and plummeted to the ground. “You take care of yourself, okay?”

Mrs. Chen glanced at the ceiling, where pounding footsteps sounded. “You got money?” When Birdie started rifling through the pockets of her army surplus coat, the woman reached for her purse. She handed over a wad of bills. “Not much. You take.”

“Mrs. Chen . . .”

“Take!” Her dark eyes snapped. Mr. Chen came into the room and she looked up at her husband. “Make her take my dough from bingo. I only give back to St. Vincent’s Church if I keep.”

There wasn’t time to argue. Birdie took the cash. Then she sighed at the large Mason jar Mr. Chen cradled, the one he sat beside his chair on Tuesday nights. Quarters, nickels, dimes—his poker winnings over the last month. His generosity was sweet, but she couldn’t possibly lug a gallon jar to the Amtrak Station without drawing stares.

“Mr. Chen, I can’t—” She cut off when he opened a pocket on her oversized coat and poured in coins. She found her voice as he moved to the other side, to weigh her down equally. “I can’t run if I’m lugging this much cargo.”

“With legs like yours? You can run, Birdie. Now go. I’ll keep the man upstairs busy. Give you time to get away.” He bounced his gaze across the pockets adorning her army coat. “Got the story with you?”

She’d placed the newspaper clipping from the Akron Register in a Ziploc bag for safekeeping. It was stashed in a zippered pocket above her heart.

Mr. Chen was the only person she’d shown the article. She didn’t trust anyone else in the building, not with a potential windfall at stake. Every family had a legend or two, and while Birdie’s clan also possessed stories of prison breaks and deals gone sour, a yarn from the Civil War probably didn’t amount to much. It was also possible her mother, who was an expert at deceit but an amateur with the truth, had pruned important facts from the story. She wasn't above playing Birdie like a mark if it suited her purpose. And a tale of lost treasure, hidden away by a freedwoman when Abe Lincoln was in office, seemed more like a fairy tale than anything else.

But on the chance the newspaper article led to something of real worth, Birdie kept the clipping on her at all times.

She made a tapping motion over her right breast. "I've got it." When Mr. Chen nodded with satisfaction, she added, "Thanks for taking care of the guy upstairs. Oh. Give this back to him."

She pulled the man's wallet from her army coat and flipped it open. Jackpot—four hundred dollars inside. It was more than enough to finance a grab-and-dash excursion to Ohio.

Pocketing the bills, she thrust the wallet at Mr. Chen. "Gotta go." The ceiling above them quaked. "I'll call next week to see how you and Mrs. Chen are doing." She gave him a quick hug, then dashed out of the apartment.

A blast of November wind nearly took her off her feet as she headed down the street. The Greyhound station was only three blocks away. Hoofing it was no problem.

Thirty minutes later, she was elbowing her way through the crowded aisle to a seat in the back of the bus. The floor was wet with a slushy snow-rain mix. Somewhere up front, a baby's wail cracked the air. Newspapers rustled and someone popped open a can. As the bus lumbered from the station, she glanced out of the window at the buildings streaming past, a few parking lots, then they were outside of the city with the rolling Kentucky hills turning white beneath the falling snow.

She pressed her face to the window and blew out a breath. A moist haze settled over the countryside reflected through the glass. Sunlight pooled in orange puddles beneath the hills as the blue of night bled into the horizon. Night was falling rapidly, and her muscles were leaden with exhaustion.

Staying in any town for too long was never a good plan, but she'd really taken to the Chens. She didn't relish the possibility of never seeing them again. Mrs. Chen had taught her how to fold dumplings so the papery skins resembled tiny kites and Mr. Chen had become an unexpected confidant. The minor criminal tendencies that lured him to the card table enabled him to accept, if not admire, her larger transgressions. Their daily conversations about Mrs. Chen's cardiovascular health and the gossip they shared about the other tenants had provided an endearing constancy. It had been some time since she'd stayed in a city long enough to learn her way around, let alone make an acquaintance. Friendship was rare, a gem she unearthed when the Chinese immigrant lobbed questions whenever he found her creeping down the hallway.

It might be several years before Birdie risked another friendship. By necessity, a thief avoided the gummy substance of relationships. Familiarity was dangerous leverage in an alliance if one member made her living slipping wallets from pockets and lifting bills from unattended purses. The threat of prison frightened her and she'd tried to go legal.

Learning the knack was impossible.

Summoning up her mother's lessons required less discipline. In a busy department store, she'd dart through the mysterious contents of a purse swinging from a woman's shoulder while its nearly unconscious owner wandered through the silks and taffetas. Her greatest shame came not from the money she took but from the personal mementos that found their way into the pockets of her coat: a crumpled grocery list, the cheery newsletter from an elementary school. A photograph of a family pressed close together before a mantle festooned with greenery.

Of course, she'd taken nothing from the Chens except their unprejudiced affection. For the space of nine weeks they'd been everything to her. Pulling the coat collar to her ears, Birdie rocked in time with the rumbling bus. The loneliness she wore like a second skin became unbearable. She began chewing her nails.

Across the aisle, a man with a beard devoured a cupcake with brown frosting. It dawned that her birthday was nearly over. Thirty-one years old . . . most women were settled down by now with a husband and children. Not that she understood much about family life. Her mother, the notorious criminal Wish Kaminsky, never stayed long with any man. She'd dragged Birdie from state to state as if they could live with their roots sheared off or flourish without a sense of permanency.

The bus shook and bumped down the highway. Curling toward the window, Birdie drew out the Ziploc bag and unfolded the newspaper clipping.

Second Chance in Small-town America. A journalist named Hugh Schaffer had written a nice feature complete with photographs of The Second Chance Grill. The article told of an auction at the restaurant. Once people learned the proceeds would help to save a girl with cancer, every last item was donated back. Blossom Perini received a life-saving bone marrow transplant, and The Second Chance Grill was back in business.

Among the items returned? A Civil War-era portrait in a shadowbox frame. Bringing the article close, Birdie gazed intently at the photograph.

Curiosity swirled through her. No, she wasn't responsible for the slaves her French ancestors had owned in the dawning years of the new republic. She'd only traveled through the South a few times and had never set foot on a plantation. Houses outside suburban Charleston now sat on the thousands of acres once owned by her forebears, the illustrious Postells. It was only fitting that their mansions had burned to the ground during the Civil War. Like slavery, they'd gone to ash.

Still, the story of a singular love had traveled down through the generations alongside the tales of war. Love between a plantation owner, who was Birdie's ancestor, and the beautiful slave who'd comforted him after his wife's death. The slave became a freedwoman and traveled north with riches given to her by her beloved. According to legend, the treasure was still hidden in a northern state.

Was the story true? Birdie couldn't hazard a guess. The bits and pieces of lore gleaned from her mother never gave enough detail to tell.

In one of the Akron Register photographs, The Second Chance Grill's buxom chef stood in the foreground. But it was the portrait, clearly visible behind her, that gripped Birdie's attention.

Is the woman in the portrait Justice Postell?

She knew enough American history to understand a daguerreotype of a black woman, taken in the mid-1800s, was unusual. The dress she wore was elegant, the collar tightly ruffled. On the bodice, tiny beads formed an elaborate design. Could a freedwoman have owned a dress so luxurious? The portrait seemed to confirm the stories of how Justice, once free, became a successful businesswoman and wealthy in her own right. After she'd escaped slavery in South Carolina, where had she gone? In what state had she lived? The answer was shrouded in history.

Still, Birdie wouldn't have believed she was actually looking at a portrait of Justice Postell if not for Hugh Schaffer's article. The feature seemed to unravel a portion of the mystery behind a scrap of parchment Wish kept in a safety deposit box in Santa Fe. Birdie's mother swore the parchment had once belonged to Justice and was a clue to the location of the treasure.

Liberty safeguards the cherished heart.

The parchment had been passed down through generations in Birdie's family as the once-proud plantation owners bred low and became a family of con artists and thieves. During those infrequent times when Birdie and her mother landed in the same city—if they were getting along—they'd stay up late drinking Rum and Cokes and theorize about the meaning behind the words.

Every snippet of family lore agreed on one fact: Justice never sold whatever she'd carried north to freedom. Gold bullion? Antique jewelry worth thousands on today's market?

Liberty safeguards . . .

So many guesses, and Birdie had never fully believed any of the stories. Until now.

The town where the portrait resided was Liberty, Ohio.